

Hannah Wesolowski

Manager, Political Involvement Practice

Public Affairs Council

Hannah Wesolowski is the manager, political involvement practice, for the Public Affairs Council. In this role, Hannah serves as the Council's lead expert on campaign finance, political action committees and political involvement program management. She acts as the primary Council resource for training, support, best practices and emerging trends in these areas, and she advises members on effective strategies for improving and expanding their organizations' political programs. Hannah also acts as the main staff liaison for the Council's Political Involvement Network, an exclusive networking and idea-sharing group with over 400 members, and the Association Micro-Network, a group targeted at providing additional resources to address the unique needs of association public affairs professionals.

Prior to joining the Council, Hannah was the director of political and grassroots advocacy at the American Speech-Language-Hearing Association, where she managed the association's political action committee and grassroots mobilization program. She also served as manager of advocacy outreach and political engagement at the American Institute of Architects. In that capacity, she helped to more than double member participation in ArchiPAC, the AIA's political action committee, and develop the AIA's first-ever voter education and get-out-the-vote effort through the DesignVote program.

A New Hampshire native, Hannah previously worked in fundraising at New York University. She also earned two degrees from NYU: a bachelor of arts in politics and a master's degree in public administration, focusing on public and nonprofit policy and finance.
